Bicultural Education in New Zealand

Educators striving to promote precollege anthropology in North America will be encouraged to learn what has been accomplished in New Zealand.

In 1987, the New Zealand government declared Maori an official national language and created the Maori Language Commission (in Maori, Te Taura Whiri i te Reo Maori). The mandate of the Commission is to work toward a society in which every government also promotes biculturalism through a compulsory elementary school curriculum in Maori culture. The curriculum, which begins in grade one, involves students in singing and counting in Maori, learning Maori names for common objects and visiting a Maori community centre (marae).

Looking beyond elementary education, the Ministry of Education is reviewing the entire national curriculum
